Biographical / Historical

Despierta Boricua

Despierta Boricua was founded in 1971 by members of the Puerto Rican student community at Yale initially to address and increase the number of Puerto Rican students applying to and being accepted at Yale. By 1972, the organization's mission evolved to assist minority students in adjusting to life at Yale and New Haven. Over the next half-century, Despierta Boricua's mission grew to bring together members of the Yale community who identify in any way with Puerto Rico in celebration of its culture, history and traditions and to promote the causes and interests of the greater Latinx community at Yale.

La Casa Cultural Julia de Burgos

Founded in 1974 as Casa Boricua, Inc., La Casa Cultural Julia de Burgos would be established in 1977 with their move to their current location at 301 Crown Street, which became the first building named for a person of color on the Yale campus. La Casa became a cultural, scholarly, and social center for Latinx students on campus, providing resources not only for students but community based programs to the greater New Haven area.

By 1999, Latinx student leaders proposed a unification of the disparate Latin and Chicano student groups into a unified cultural center under the La Casa aegis.

Alicea, Noel

2021 November 12

Noel Alicea was born and raised in Newark, New Jersey. His parents migrated from Puerto Rico in the 1950s and met in New Jersey. Noel describes himself as a queer Latino of first-generation experience. He describes his neighborhood as largely Italian and Irish, although in the 1980s and 1990s, the demographic was shifting with an influx of Latinos and African-Americans into the neighborhood. Noel mentions growing up around his extended Puerto Rican family in his community, alongside other Puerto Ricans with whom he shared similar experiences. In Newark, he attended a magnet school that was unlike other schools in the Newark school system. Through this educational experience, Noel was encouraged to apply to college. As a senior, he assumed he would become an engineer, but once at Yale, he decided to continue as a History major, primarily focusing on Latin American courses. After his time at Yale, and through his experiences organizing around the AIDs epidemic, Noel now works in a hospital focusing on communication. Noel graduated Yale class of 1989.

Noel applied to Yale because of its distance, and closeness, to Newark. It was his first time living on his own, away from his parents. He recalls this as a moment that, although new and different, was freeing and allowed him to explore himself and his identity away from Newark. When Noel was accepted to Yale, he was invited to "minority weekend," which was a recruiting weekend for admits organized by DB, MECHA, BSAY, and AASA. Here, Noel connected with and met several other Puerto Rican studies which encouraged him to commit to Yale, realizing that it could be a space of support and growth for him. Once he accepted, he was part of the summer diversity bridge program, PROP, which began through DB's organizing for the Yale administration to provide more support for minoritized students. In these two diversity events and programs, Noel met members of DB and this encouraged him to further participate in their activities once he moved to New Haven and became enrolled at Yale as a student. He describes DB providing and offering a space of sustained support. Although not always active in DB, he remembers that DB was always there for support as an open space for students to turn to when needed. For Noel, DB became a support network that connected him to others who shared similar experiences with him, particularly other queer Latino students of first-generation experience. Because of the support he had received as an incoming freshman, as a senior Noel decided to apply to become one of DB's two counselors who worked with freshman students. He remembers this as being a rewarding experience in which he could support queer students of color who were struggling with their identity and presence at Yale.

Noel learned about the history and commitments and goals of DB through students who were also active in DB. Many of these students imparted their memories and experiences with DB to Noel. This is how he learned that DB was committed to creating a space for Latino students who were not completely supported by Yale's administration. Because of this DB was committed to pressuring the administration to fully support Latino students once they became enrolled at Yale, not only during minority recruitment events and programs. He also recalled students pushing for the hiring of Latino professors to create a consistent course offering of topics related to Puerto Rico and Latin America at large.

Noel also recalls several tensions within DB, given that it was an organization made up of different individuals with different understandings of Puertoricanness based on experiences on the mainland and on the island. He recalls his time in DB as expanding his ideas of his own identity, particularly around what it meant to be from the mainland vs the island and the socioeconomic differences between each group. Noel looks back on this experience as something that was eye opening but also very informative of the politics that inform expressions of Puertoricanness.

Arroyo, Alfredo

2022 March 17

This interview featured Alfredo Arroyo, a member of the class of 2019 at Yale. He was a co-president of the Ballet Folklorico dance group, as well as heavily involved in MEChA and La Unidad Latina, Lambda Upsilon Lambda Fraternity, Inc., a Latino-based fraternity. He was also a volunteer at the HAVEN Free Clinic as a translator, was involved with La Unidad Latina en Accion in New Haven (ULA), a human rights organization in New Haven, and worked at Dwight Hall, Yale's center for public service and social justice. Visual art and music are also key parts of his identity and experience in the time he spent at Yale and beyond.

Alfredo described his increasing awareness and interest in justice for undocumented populations growing while in college, despite being exposed to these communities beforehand in the time he was growing up in the largely Mexican community he had in La Puente, California. He has engaged with this issue in several spheres, whether through his work in medicine and healthcare access, activism, dance, or visual art. As a current medical student and aspiring community physician, his aim is to work in communities with little access to these resources. Having worked in translation services in free clinics and now supporting California clinics in vaccine distribution, he describes the ability to connect with his community in a new way as very powerful. Through college, he engaged in many protests including that of Nelson Pinos regarding sanctuary and other deportation issues, and spent time engaging with the New Haven immigrant community through ULA.

The Ballet Folklorico dance group was both an activity and a community that played a role throughout his college experience. He describes the people as the most important aspect of it. Although he did not dance or hear Mexican folk music prior to coming to Yale, he says it was yet another way to engage more deeply with his own culture, especially being so far from home. He discussed a desire to learn more about his own family, the places they came from, connection to indigeneity, and more, and this awareness grew as he got older and took more agency in this work. He also describes the role of music in particular as something that is grounding and powerful, and remains a part of his life, whether playing in the church as a child or composing music on the guitar now.

Art plays a key role in Alfredo's day-to-day life. While currently working on a daily series featuring all sorts of interesting character designs, Alfredo's work in college was often cultural and political. He describes two paintings that were featured in a Yale Medical school exhibit, one of a bright, abstract Folklorico dancer, and another of the faces of his ancestors. He describes the beauty of seeing this work in a place it would otherwise never be found, and hopes that others can personally connect with the pieces in different ways. While his art could be seen as statements on social and political issues, he also describes the process as simply meditative and an important part of connecting with himself.

Arzuaga, Patricia

Patricia Arzuaga graduated from Yale University in 1986 with a Bachelor of Arts in Latin American Studies. Born to Puerto Rican parents, she grew up in the Bronx surrounded by peers of a mix of nationalities, but predominantly Caribbean. "My ability to interact with so many different kinds of people really set the stage for the rest of my life," Patricia shared. "New York City is a really special place that way, where you are literally around people from all over the world."

Because the New York public school system presented a variety of challenges for Latino students, Patricia was fortunate to obtain a scholarship to a New York City private school. While she credits her elementary and high school education as preparing her well for university life at Yale, she also found it challenging to attend a school with a predominantly White and Jewish student body. For instance, she recalled a guidance counselor who once accused her of arrogance for only applying to a handful of universities without realizing Patricia's working-class family could not afford the application fees. Despite being a first-generation college student, her parents instilled in her the value of education and encouraged her to pursue her bachelor's degree. At Yale, Patricia delved deeply into subjects related to political science, history, Portuguese, and Spanish. Her most significant experience, however, was the opportunity to become involved in Despierta Boricua: "it was an important place to learn a lot about myself and a lot about others who perhaps had different experiences, although we all called ourselves Puerto Rican." As part of this organization, she developed a close circle of friendships nicknamed "Las Chicas," who she has kept in touch with throughout the years. Following the shooting at the Pulse Night Club, which personally affected one of the group's members, the girls began hosting support group calls, which then evolved to Zoom sessions during the pandemic—an activity that Patricia recalled as crucial to helping her survive the pandemic and her maintain her sanity: "It's been an important group to just chat and share life experiences... as you move along in life, from divorces to losses of spouses, and navigating children transitioning or coming out, we've all been able to talk about it in a really warm and familiar kind of way."

Her background and experience at Despierta Boricua motivated her to give back to the Latino community. She has served on community nonprofit boards, including the Latin American Youth Center, an organization that provides educational, workforce development, housing, and health and wellness services to over 4,000 kids and families at various youth centers: "I think [this] came from a deep sense that I had been so privileged. I've been so lucky to have been picked up to go to private school, lucky to then have done well enough to go to an Ivy League school, and [I developed] a sense that everybody deserves that right on some level or another, even if you don't start out with a family intact or even with a roof over your head."

Ayala, Alma

2022 March 14

Alma Ayala graduated Yale in 1986, and she was the first person in her family to make it past 9th grade. She and her younger siblings were raised by a single mother. They moved around, but their mother always emphasized the value of education to them, arranging to pay for the Encyclopedia Britannica in installments at a time when even buying food for their family was a challenge. Alma developed a close relationship with a few of her teachers, and with their encouragement she applied to colleges that were far from home, and got into Yale. She credits her mother with her decision to go to Yale -- she wasn't overjoyed that Alma was moving far away, but still pushed her to go as far as she could with her education, understanding it as an investment in her future.

Coming to Yale was a culture shock for Alma. Alma came from a working class family, and though she had had some exposure to experiences outside of her own from her mother and from school, at Yale she met people from a class background that "just didn't even make sense" to her. She encountered attitudes of entitlement and levels of ignorance that both hurt and angered her and confused her; she was surprised that people who had been exposed to so much of the world and were so educated on history could still be racist. The racism, classism, homophobia, and sexism that pervaded this environment made it difficult for her to learn in the way some of her classmates could, and she didn't have the support that many of her classmates did, because she was the first in her family to make it that far in school. Alma found community, though, at La Casa Cultural and in Despierta Boricua. These were both places for community bonding and release and for organizing and mobilizing. They had dances, dinners, parties and excursions, and she learned how to dance salsa, cook Latin food, and play dominos for the first time in DB. They pushed the school to make policy changes, held demonstrations and discussions, and even recruited more Latine students. Alma was in fact the first person from Yale to recruit from her high school in Chicago, after Yale refused to send recruiters but told the students they could go. Through her involvement with DB she learned that "speaking up in that way, about things [she] was seeing, that [she] thought was important and was being ignored, or misunderstood, was called being political, and was called being active." She learned what people did or did not care about, how to speak about the issues she cared about in order to make change, and how to collaborate with different groups on campus to make change.

However, being involved with DB and La Casa forced her to reckon with her identity in ways she hadn't before. In DB, Alma found herself having to defend her Puerto Rican identity for the first time, as she met kids who were born and raised on the island. Her identities as Puerto Rican, as lower working class, as a woman, as a lesbian, as someone darker-skinned, and so forth competed for her focus. She felt like she was "constantly having to navigate what felt safe, and what was safe to talk about," in particular spaces and times. Alma found it especially difficult to navigate her lesbian identity in conjunction with her Puerto Rican identity in the spaces she was in. Many of her peers in DB didn't accept LGBTQ+ folks, and the LGBTQ+ spaces on campus were white-dominated and hostile to her as a Puerto Rican. Eventually, she found a group of other LGBTQ+ students within DB, and they became close friends, a safe space, and a crucial support system as she worked to figure out how to exist in her identities.

In her sophomore year, Alma read the book "This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color", an anthology that is credited with being the foundation of third-wave feminism. Alma found herself struck by how unapologetic the writers were in embracing and living in the intersection of all of their identities. She wrote to the authors of the book, got funding, and planned and hosted a 2 day conference featuring some of the authors. The conference gathered a lot of attention and sparked new, important conversations around campus about what intersectionality meant. Alma maintained correspondence with a few of the authors afterward, and ultimately was quoted in the introduction of the next edition of the book. Alma was always interested in people, and she took classes that dove into what drives people, and what makes them who they are. She didn't come in with a major in mind, but after a couple years her advisor told her she was only a couple credits away from an American Studies degree, so she majored in American Studies.

After graduating from Yale, burnt out from school, Alma took a series of jobs in New Haven, in local government and community organizations. She got to see the relationship between Yale and New Haven from a different angle, and was frustrated by the bureaucracy she encountered when trying to strengthen that relationship. She didn't tell people at these jobs that she had gone to Yale because she was afraid of facing backlash, and when she did tell people years later, she often heard "Oh, but you're different," in response. She matriculated at Harvard 4 or 5 years later, where she got her MPA, after which she continued with organization and nonprofit work. She now lives in St. Petersburg, Florida.

Barbot, Oxiris

2022 March 16

Oxiris Barbot has dedicated her career to achieving health equity and advancing social justice. When she was commissioner of health for New York City, she led the nation's largest municipal health department in centering an equity agenda on communities, bridging public health and health care delivery, and leveraging data for action and policy. She successfully guided the city's responses to the first wave of the COVID-19 pandemic and to New York City's largest measles outbreak in 30 years.

A 1965 Yale University graduate, Oxiris was born to Puerto Rican parents but grew up in the South Bronx as well as Essex County, New Jersey. A trailblazer from a young age, Oxiris pursued opportunities typically reserved only for boys. In elementary school, she joined an all-boys baseball league and then played the saxophone in the school band because "not a lot of girls played the saxophone and [she] wanted to do something different." Oxiris considers herself as a "Nuyorican," a term of pride used by New Yorkers with deep Puerto Rican roots, an identity that evolved during her time at Yale.

A first-generation student, Oxiris' family emphasized the importance of education as a way to progress forward. It was a high school teacher, however, who encouraged her to apply to top-tier universities: "I had no clue what it meant to go to an Ivy League school, so I had teachers that were incredibly supportive and really held my hand along the process."

At Yale, Oxiris pursued a Bachelor of Arts degree in American studies, as part of which she completed an honors thesis on the Young Lords Party and their health platform. Among her most significant college experiences, however, was her participation in Despierta Boricua at a time when Yale matriculated the lowest number of Latinx students the university had ever had: "Because of the fact that I was not as dark-skinned as a lot of my friends in DB, I had the privilege, if I so wanted to, to pass and that was something that I fought against. Yale and my experience through DB really cemented the importance of alliances and allegiances, and the fact that to the outside world, it didn't matter if you were Puerto Rican, Mexican, Salvadoran—we were all in this one block, but there was a political awareness that was really catalyzed at Yale through the participation in DB." Oxiris also credits her mother as helping to cement her passion for social justice: "[My mom] always pounded into my head 'don't forget where you come from' [...] you have an obligation to provide for those who come after you." Upon graduating from Yale, Oxiris pursued a career in medicine and then dedicated her life to public health. In 2010, she was recruited to be commissioner of the Baltimore City Health Department, where she was the principal architect of Health Baltimore 2015, the city's roadmap for better health outcomes. It was Baltimore City's first health agenda with a racial equity lens. Now, her focus is to support preventive efforts in the mental wellness space. "I want to be remembered as someone who was open, loving, supportive, and interested in helping people thrive and flourish," Oxiris shared. "Someone who was a tenacious advocate for health equity and racial equity and social justice."

Brau-Diaz, Raquel

2022 March 21

Raquel Brau Diaz attended Yale College from 2014-2018, graduating with a BA in Ethnicity, Race, and Migration. She studied at Grace Hopper College.

Raquel grew up on the Upper West Side of Manhattan in New York. She applied early to Yale, and was drawn to it because she was interested in the creative arts and she felt Yale balanced strong academics with artistic opportunities. Her family was excited for her to attend Yale, especially because it would allow her to receive an amazing education while staying relatively close to home.

Raquel's main community on campus came from people who shared similar music and nightlife interests; she and her friends got into underground electronic, house, and techno music together. These friends, mostly fellow women of color, learned how to DJ and began to create what she describes as "alternative music spaces and alternative party spaces" which would serve as alternatives to "the Toads and frat party scene." They created a DJ collective called "miss/chief," and Raquel describes that it was with these friends that she felt most like her authentic self. This group emerged primarily during Raquel's senior year, when many of her friends were joining secret societies. She had opted out of secret societies because she felt they were too exclusive and inorganic, and miss/chief kept her from feeling left out and offered an alternative opportunity to throw parties that were inclusive and open to anyone.

Raquel was casually involved with Despierta Boricua. She would go to events occasionally, especially when she saw that they might have good food, but didn't go to regular meetings or take on any leadership roles. She remembers a Christmas party at La Casa where they'd catered pasteles, coquito, arroz con gandules, and platanos, and she felt that this was comforting. She attributes her limited involvement with DB at least partially to the fact that, as a half-Puerto Rican person, she did not always feel she fully belonged in that space. She felt that the experience of being a mixed ethnicity person was unique and therefore she did not always feel represented at La Casa. There was, however, a group started by students for people who were mixed race or mixed ethnicity, and she went to this group's meetings. She felt the members of this group understood her and had conversations that resonated with her experiences.

She describes that this was a great alternative space for students to talk about their experiences of "being too white for this, or being too not white for this," and existing in that limbo space. She was able to find belonging there.

Raquel was also part of the Urban Improvement Corps (UIC), a tutoring organization based out of the Afro-American Cultural Center. She took on leadership with UIC, and therefore ended up spending more time at the Afro-American Cultural Center than she did at La Casa. UIC was an avenue which allowed her to connect with the broader New Haven community; she tutored one girl for all four of the years she spent at Yale, and therefore got close with her and her family. This is what Raquel liked most about her time at Yale: because she was not as active in the formal/traditional organizations at Yale, she was able to connect and engage with the New Haven community more broadly. Her time at Yale taught her to seek out communities beyond formal or assigned spaces.

She is now a third grade teacher in New York City and is pursuing her master's degree in bilingual childhood education. She continues to DJ and throw parties with miss/chief, who are now based out of New York.

Burgos, Arlene

2021 November 3

Arlene applied to Yale from a public high school, where she received little support in the college application process and where her ability to succeed at an Ivy League university was openly doubted. She describes her family, and particularly her late father, as critical support systems in her life and a critical factor in her success.

Once at Yale, Arlene found the Despierta Boricua community almost immediately and quickly became deeply involved in the social and political life of the organization. Arlene described most of her social experience at Yale in relation to Despierta Borica. She notes that Despierta Boricua usually worked closely with and socialized with groups on campus that had similar goals, such as MEChA and organizations affiliated with the Afro-American Cultural Center. During her time in DB, Arlene worked as a student recruitment coordinator, fighting to diversify the student body and recruit diverse faculty. This work involved visiting primarily low-income schools and providing students with information about Yale and encouraging them to apply.

Colon, Adriana

2021 October 21

Adriana Colon Adorno was born in Humacao, Puerto Rico and graduated from Yale University in 2020 with a Bachelor of Science in Environmental Studies. Her undergraduate thesis focused on mangrove restoration in Puerto Rico. She is currently pursuing a Master's Degree in City and Regional Planning at Georgia Institute of Technology. During her time at Yale, she served as Despierta Boricua's co-chair specifically working with the Environmental Justice Coalition and issues regarding the debt crisis, air pollution, hurricanes, and disaster capitalism in Puerto Rico.

This interview focuses on her experience as a member of Despierta Boricua but also covers a variety of topics including family background, educational trajectory, growing up in Connecticut, environmental stewardship, mainlander vs. islander tensions, cross cultural group relations, lack of institutional support, and organizing at Yale. Adriana's mother migrated to the United States in search of better economic opportunities to support her family as a single mother. They initially arrived in Springfield, Massachusetts but later moved to Windsor Locks in Hartford County, Connecticut. Adriana explained that growing up in this predominantly white neighborhood was difficult as the segregation of schools and neighborhoods were quite apparent and made it difficult to feel at home. Despite the feelings of unbelonging in Connecticut Adriana excelled in school and always knew what she wanted to do when she went to college but the application process itself was not as straightforward. In fact, she did not know much about Yale despite growing up in Connecticut and frequently visiting New Haven. Yale simply "wasn't in my realm of living at all."

This exclusive nature would also manifest itself during her time at Yale, informing her experience in Despierta Boricua as she recalled that they "always made do but there was always the possibility they could do more if Yale would just care." Overall, however, she emphasized that Despierta Boricua helped build her confidence, something she stressed was crucial in an institution that thrives off "exploitation and inequality." We ended the interview with her sharing the following piece of advice for future students: "Don't be too worried about doing things correctly or the right way to be a Latinx student on campus. Don't worry about fixing Yale. You owe it to yourself and your community to contribute to things when you can but it's also not your job as a student to fix everything that is wrong with Yale even though Yale loves to put that on students...Let DB be a place of enjoyment, a place of refuge. It should be there to uplift you and help you keep your sanity at a place like Yale. Don't take on all that pressure and that weight. Enjoy your time as much as you can, which can be difficult because it can be an unpleasant place sometimes but enjoy it as much as you can, enjoy those relationships that you build with people. There is an amazing community at Yale. I always say I have no love for Yale as an institution, but I will always have love and a special place in my heart for the community and the people that I met at Yale. So, find joy in that and don't worry too much about everything else."
