Biographical / Historical

William Fergusson was born in Ayre, England on June 19, 1773. He attended medical classes in Edinburgh, Scotland, and practiced in London hospitals. Fergusson became assistant-surgeon in the army and saw duty in Holland, the West Indies, the Baltic, the Iberian Peninsula, and the expedition against Guadaloupe in 1815. He retired from the service in 1817, and practiced in Edinburgh until 1821, when he moved to Windsor. Fergusson was disabled by paralysis in 1843 and he died in January 1846. He published medical papers on syphilis, malaria fevers, and malaria.

Scope and Contents

The papers consist of the correspondence and related papers of William Fergusson, a British physician who served as inspector-general of military hospitals during the early 1800s. The material documents his military experiences in Portugal, in the service of the British Army from 1804-1812, and includes a small quantity of items from 1813-1831. The papers are arranged in chronological order, with typescripts of most items filed with the originals.

Correspondence includes letters from medical and military figures, reports of hospital statistics regarding the care and treatment of sick and wounded soldiers, and exchanges relating to the charges of professional misconduct filed against Fergusson. As inspector-general of military hospitals Fergusson oversaw the administration of medical operations, including staffing and personnel matters, supply and equipment needs, and financial considerations. Included among the correspondents are: Robert Arbuthnot, Andrew Halliday, and Adam Neale.

The William Fergusson Papers were collected by Harvey W. Cushing. The papers were transferred from the Historical Medical Library in 1981.
