Biographical / Historical

The Liverpool Emancipation Society was founded in 1863. As was true of other emancipation societies in Britain, the Liverpool society was founded to "instruct the public mind in England of the true conditions of the American question through lectures and public discussions." The society was, in a city looked upon as a stronghold of southern and pro-slavery sentiment, avowedly abolitionist and supportive of Abraham Lincoln. John Croper served as chairman of the society and Robert Trimble was its secretary. The society's leadership tried to secure the participation of many of the local clergy.

Scope and Contents

The Liverpool Emancipation Society records include correspondence, notes, printed circulars, and other memorabilia, which document the activities of the society from its founding in 1863 until the end of the American Civil War in 1865. The records are arranged in chronological order.

Correspondence addressed to the society's secretary Robert Trimble comprises the bulk of the records. Most correspondents write either accepting or rejecting membership in the society. Those declining membership express their opinions on the seriousness with which the North was pursuing the abolition of slavery. There is also correspondence with other local emancipation societies such as those in Manchester and London. Several letters in 1865 included donations of money and supplies to aid distressed freedmen. Other records concern arrangements and speakers for society meetings and fund raising events. Henry Ward Beecher appeared at the October 30, 1863, meeting of the society.

Nelson Works donated the records to the Yale University Library in 1986.
