Biographical / Historical

Henry Kohn, who earned his B.A. degree from Yale College in 1939 and his J.D. degree from Yale Law School in 1942, founded the American Jewish Society for Service (AJSS) in 1950. Since then, the organization has provided assistance every summer to various disadvantaged small towns, urban centers, and Native American reservations throughout the United States. The AJSS has also stressed to American teenagers the social and personal value of volunteer service through intensive manual labor. Advertisements soliciting high school applicants have appeared in major newspapers and public service bulletins throughout the United States each year. While most students are drawn from the Jewish American high school community, religion or ethnicity is not a requirement. Camper activities have included building, repairing, weatherizing, and renovating homes, shelters, churches, parks, and community centers, as well as clearing land, demolishing unneeded structures, digging ditches, and installing pipes and cables. To promote contact with their host communities and to foster the spirit of camaraderie, the AJSS also has provided the campers with numerous field trips, guest speaker presentations, and general recreational activities associated with camp life. Many Jewish campers also have used this time to explore the tenets of their faith through formal and informal discussions.

The first AJSS project took place in Indianapolis, Indiana, in July and August of 1951 when college students also qualified as applicants. Campers joined with Flanner House Homes, Inc., to help build single-unit dwellings for African American war veterans living in an impoverished section of the city. Religious life centered each Friday evening on the Kiddush and Sabbath observance, though religious affiliations within and outside of Judaism varied among the participants. Each work camp since then has been typically configured with a director, the director's spouse, one male and one female counselor, and, as of 1953 when college students were no longer asked to apply, ten to twenty male and female high school juniors and seniors at least sixteen years of age. The AJSS has provided food and housing at the summer project site for a modest fee, and project directors have arranged the recreational, educational, and religious activities. At the end of every project, the campers have compiled reports featuring their own poems and essays reflecting on the summer. Many also have written letters afterward, at the request of the AJSS, evaluating their experiences. By the mid-1960s and into the 1970s, as many as four AJSS projects were taking place at once, depending on the summer.

The AJSS celebrated its forty-fifth anniversary in 1995 and the completion of 106 projects in forty-two states.

Scope and Contents

The records comprehensively document the organizational and operational history of the American Jewish Society for Service and its summer camps through administrative correspondence; meeting summaries; site documentation, including proposals, information packets, reports, and evaluations; publicity; and visual materials, including photographs, film, and videotapes.

One strength of the records is documentation of the organization's formation, growth, daily operations, and social service activities throughout the United States, from 1951-1984. The records also shed light on the impact AJSS work camps have had on certain impoverished segments of American society. Administrative files of general and project site records, photographs, and feature newspaper articles provide background information on the disadvantaged towns, city neighborhoods, and Native American reservations in which the AJSS has set up projects. The records also document the accomplishments of the AJSS at each site. Project summaries and reports reveal the ways in which impoverished communities have reacted and adjusted when AJSS volunteers have taken up temporary residence to perform manual labor, as well as to provide day care supervision and language tutoring. Summary project reports and AJSS promotional materials, including the annual newsletters and anniversary commemorative books, comprehensively illustrate the evolution of AJSS philosophy on Jewish-based social services in America, and how administrative experience and changing social conditions have refined that philosophy. Finally, evaluations from camp directors and counselors, letters by campers written to the AJSS, reports by campers, and photographs provide insight into the impressions, reactions, and changes in perspective teenagers have when, as AJSS volunteers, they meet and form working relationships among themselves, with adult leaders, and with residents of disadvantaged communities.

Collection Contents

Series I: Administrative records, 1948-1983

7.25 linear feet

This series documents the philosophical foundation, administrative operations, and summer projects of the American Jewish Society for Service (AJSS). The general files under each chronological heading include a variety of materials explaining the ongoing goals and objectives of the AJSS. The various records emphasize how each summer project has related to the fulfillment of the AJSS's mission, and how that mission has evolved since 1951. The general files were used mostly by AJSS administrators as information resources for major reports, newsletters, press releases, and other promotional publications. The records include correspondence, meeting notes, project proposals, promotional articles and pamphlets, materials from other work camp organizations, and various forms of AJSS project documentation similar to what is found in the project files. Series V, Oversize materials, includes similar promotional materials in full page newspaper format.

The AJSS project files, organized by location of the project each year, document specific summer work camps. The files provide comprehensive background information on the needs and socioeconomic conditions of each location. They include camp information outlines and site descriptions, general camper guidelines, correspondence between camp directors and AJSS headquarters, lists of campers, and articles from local or regional publications. The project files also include letters and reports written by campers--some with poems, essays, and creative prose--describing the impact of their work camp experiences; project site director and counselor reports used for evaluating summer camp organization, effectiveness, and efficiency; and letters and certificates of gratitude from host sites. If project files for a specific service camp do not appear in the inventory, the researcher should consult the general files for that year. There is no substantive information in either the general or project files on how AJSS decided on work camp locations.

The series is arranged chronologically.

Series II: Chronological files, 1950-1984*1.75 linear feet*

The AJSS maintained a chronological mail file periodically throughout the 1950s and 1960s, and then continuously from 1970-1984. The file comprises both incoming and outgoing administrative correspondence with attachments. Included is correspondence with project camp directors, campers, officials from project sites, and donors. Camper address lists for the time period 1951-1970 are also included. Researchers should also consult correspondence in Series I, Administrative records.

The series is arranged chronologically, and within each folder in reverse chronological order.

Series III: Newsletters and commemorative books, 1960-2000

0.2 linear feet

This series consists of AJSS promotional material in the form of published newsletters and anniversary commemorative books. The AJSS began publishing newsletters in 1960 as a type of public report on the activities and accomplishments of each service camp. The newsletters include articles reporting on the projects and project locations, as well as pictures of the actual work and the names of all AJSS officers, directors, and campers involved. The anniversary books include articles of tribute describing many AJSS activities and accomplishments, as well as reproductions of all annual newsletters published in the time covered by the commemoration.

This series is arranged chronologically.

Series IV: Audiovisual materials, 1951-1992*3 linear feet*

This series comprises photographs, photographic negatives, film reels, and videotape. Black-and-white and color photographs include images of campers engaged in work or recreation, as well as work sites before, during, and after the project. Many of the photographs were used for promotional material for AJSS, including the annual newsletter.

Copies of commercially produced audiovisual materials contained in this collection cannot be made for researcher use outside of the repository.

This series is arranged by material type. Photographs are arranged chronologically, and therein by project site.
